Chat rooms don't get the love they once did. AOL Instant Messenger, IRC and other similar chat services don't actually exist much anymore, despite a spike in data-driven messaging services. However, there are still some great chat experiences out there if you know where to find them. There are a ton of messenger apps that allow group chats. In fact, almost all of them do with our knowledge. However, these apps rarely have public chat rooms to join and interact with random people. If all you need are group messages, we could recommend our best list of messenger apps linked just below. Otherwise, let's check out the best chat apps for Android! AminoBandDiscordGrouviC- MeetMeTelegramViberWhisperelloPrice: Free with shopping in the AppAmino is a popular chat app similar in reach to apps such as Band or Discord. There are different communities for different topics and you can create your own if you want. Discord likes to serve mostly gamers, but Aino likes to serve as many people as possible, and that's probably why it's so popular. Either way, you can explore the app, join communities, chat with people, and customize your profile. However, people stay for a variety of extras like Instagram and Snapchat-style stories, the ability to add surveys and quizzes, and even watch videos or read blogs. It's a strangely neat all-in-one style chat if you're into that sort of thing. BandPrice: FreeBand is a popular group chat app with a focus on common themes. You can create them for work, sports, games, schools, video games, family, friends, etc. It has features that work for almost all of these kinds of things. The actual chat experience is very similar to the standard chat app, so there are no surprises there. The app has no public chats like many others. However, there are many organizations and groups that use this so you can face it on your own after all. We would like a little more power over things like notifications because this app sends a lot of them, but otherwise it's a very decent experience. DiscordPrice: Free/$4.99 per monthDiscord is one of the most popular chat apps on the list. This is predominantly for gamers, not normal people. However, normal people can use it as well. It's just a chat app with lots of features, so don't feel like you just have to use it for gaming. This one is mostly dabbled in private chat rooms, but there are some public chats out there if you're looking for them. Some other features include voice channels, direct messages between individual members, and you can join as many servers as you want. It is also completely free to use. Subscription $4.99 only adds additional services such as GIF emotes and the ability to use any emot on any server. GrouviPrice: FreeGrouvi is a bit of a wild card on this list. It's newer, not very popular and we don't know much about it. However, it boasts a classic public chat experience with a number of chat rooms for a variety of topics. It seems, it seems, be a trend towards tech-savvy topics like ethical hacking or Linux. This is definitely not some random dating site chat style app. It wasn't too active during our testing, but then again it's pretty new and there aren't a ton of people. It may be fun, it may not be, but only time will tell. At the same time, the app is free without advertising or in-app purchases at the time of writing this article. IPCCena: FreeIC is one of the classic chat apps. It has undergone several changes over the years. Now it functions like your standard chat apps do these days. You can send messages, video chat, and all that. However, it also still offers a casual public chat similar to the old AIM or IRC service. There are chat rooms for students, new IC users, people in their 30s, people in their 20s, people from different parts of the world, some late night chats, and more. Those looking for classic late 1990s, early 2000s style chat rooms should look no further because IC still have them after all these years. MeetMePrice: Free with the in-app purchasesMeetMe is a cross between a dating service and a chat app. It boasts a load of active users, but they are not very well distributed between the sexes. So, it's not as great as a standalone dating site. It's a good way to meet people though, and you get into chats with random strangers so it technically performs qualifications. This is one of the weaker options on this list, however. The app claims to be for all ages and it's funny. It's obviously adults-only. This is acceptable from time to time, and a large number of people increase your chances of finding interesting people. However, we probably recommend one of the nine other chat apps first. TelegramPrice: FreeTelegram is one of the most popular messaging apps on the list. It functions primarily as a private chat app with a group chat function. However, you can create chats in the app (called channels). These channels are private. However, tons of organizations, people, groups, etc. make their chat rooms public for the sake of communication. You can also create channels and share a link with someone who create your own. It would be amazing if Telegram had a community of public chats, but the community of private chats is so good that it is almost as good. You may just need to search around easily accessible channels on Google Search.ViberPrice: Free with the in-app purchasesViber as a much more popular version of Nimbuzz. It focuses mainly on text chats, voice calls, and video chats along with fun things like stickers, group chats, and other things. You can also make phone calls to landline-style Skype for a nominal fee. However, he has a choice of public to meet new people, discuss topics and the like. You can find chats for basically nothing or you can create your own and people will join eventually (probably). In-app shopping is for things like a regular phone phone fees and packages with stickers. Most of the services are completely free to use. WhisperPrice: FreeWhisper is one of the few classic chat-style apps with some popularity. It boasts a community of 30 million monthly active users and chats for all kinds of fun topics. In addition, you can find chats popular on the service, things going on nearby (location permission required), and the newest chat rooms on the service. The biggest difference is that it uses a tweet-style placement system instead of a standard UI chat interface. That makes it different for sure. There are also a significant number of negative people who say and do negative things, but how much it matters depends on your level of tolerance to this kind of behavior. It's fun, but he has his own problems. Sellocena: Frizzello is a dual-use app. It has a walk talkie feature with a push-to-talk style that allows you to communicate with basically anyone on the fly. However, it also has a different chat style feature as well. You can create public chat rooms or private ones with up to 6,000 users at a time, and you can use the PTT feature to actually talk to them ham-style. We don't recommend this for your standard, old-school internet chat experience. However, it has its own charms. If we missed any great chat apps for Android, tell us about them in the comments!
